

Women Best As Animal Trainers, Circus Man Says

"Women are better animal trainers than men," Al G. Barnes, of the circus, is quoted as saying. "And why shouldn't they be good trainers? Women all their lives have been forced to deal with males, and if they tameness methods had not been somewhat successful what a difficult place the world would be to live in. Man in his natural state is impatient, gruff, rough and unreasoning."

Men hate to wait for anything from food to self expression, and then are naturally rude, having a habit of interrupting. They want from life, men have no creative imagination, their only motive of existence being their name, "which they want when they want them."

Life without the taming power of women would be sort of a snatch-grab existence, with the meek people being stepped on by the stronger and the ruthless folk being denied any help.

The first requisite in all animal training is looking the beast in the eye. Women early began such tactics with their "ferocious" eyes. Half of the men found out that all men and animals were naturally afraid of the woman's eyes. Any woman who can outlook a man has her way with him.

Cats are distinctly masculine. Cats are cruel. So are men. Cats like warm fires and soothing foods, so do men. Cats like you only when you caress them; males ditto. So the animal theory holds good all the way through, cat, cat and all.
